White House Says Transmission Key Pillar In Second Term Energy Agenda

White House energy adviser Heather Zichal says that if President Obama is re-elected, officials hope to use his second term to revive so-far unsuccessful efforts to advance a transmission policy as a main pillar in the administration's strategy to advance both renewable energy and natural gas as an interconnected resource.

Rights Advocates Urge EPA To Reinstate Claim Over California GHG Rule

Environmental justice advocates are urging EPA to reinstate their claim that California's greenhouse gas (GHG) trading program violates Title VI of the Civil Rights Act (CRA), saying the agency's rejection of their claim as not "ripe" was made in error and violates a precedent set by other agency decisions and related legal rulings.

Inhofe Says Post-Election EPA Rules Will Shutter Fossil Fuel Production

Sen. James Inhofe (R-OK) is accusing EPA of intentionally delaying a slew of rules until after the election so that the Obama administration can skirt accusations that it is seeking to shutter fossil fuel production and associated economic pain before voters go to the polls Nov. 6 to choose between President Obama and Gov. Mitt Romney.

GOP Blames EPA For Coal Sector Losses But New Study Tags Gas Prices

Republican candidates are stepping up their campaigns blaming EPA and its rules for contractions in the coal sector, a key employer in many swing states, despite recent findings showing that low natural gas prices are more likely to blame for the job losses than EPA rules.
